“ When I was growing up, I would pick up rocks when dad and I would go walking or even during family picnics. Any I found that I liked I would give to daddy. On my wedding day daddy asked if I was really sure that I wanted to marry the man. My answer was, "yes." He reached into his pocket and pulled out a small bag. He handed it to me and said, "there are going to be hard times, and whenever there are hard times I should take out my little bag of rocks and remember the good times that went with them. The bag was filled with the rocks that I had given him over the years, right down to the little piece of asphalt. I still have the rocks.

“ Since my father's service is over, I don't know if anyone will see this. However, I wanted to share this "memory". When my daughter and niece were little, my dad taught them to blow the covers off straws and then use the covers as spitwads. My daughter remembers this as well and has taught her son how to shoot the covers off straws. She says she doesn't think she will teach him the spitwad part.
